N. Public Information

In this stage of my career, I am increasingly focused on providing reliable public scientific information. On average I appear on about one podcast, radio show, or TV show each week; I have a podcast of my own called Days Are Getting Better that appears about once a month and has reached several hundred thousand people; I issue a monthly written newsletter that has been read over one million times; my TEDx talks have been viewed over a million times; I write a blog that appears in multiple channels and has been read about two to three million times. My work has been written about in national media such as the Wall Street Journal or Time Magazine. The World Health Organization distributes ACT in more than a dozen languages worldwide.

P. Statement of Current Professional Interests

In the broadest terms, I am interested in the application of contextualistic perspectives to conceptual, methodological, and technological problems in psychology, both applied and basic. Stated another way, I am working to foster the development of contextual behavioral science. I am about equally interested in professional organizational work, administration, teaching and supervision, clinical practice and other applied work, research, and public information.

My specific interests are as follows

Integration of behavioral and biological science. I believe it is essential to nest contextual behavioral psychology into modern evolutionary science, and I am exploring the intellectual and practice implications of that integration.

Philosophy of science. I have worked to develop functional contextualism as a viable philosophical system and to explore its implications for behavioral and biological sciences.

Methodology and research strategy. I have focused on how to link functional contextual thinking to methodological and strategic issues such areas as idionomic data analysis, avoidance of the ergodic error, time-series (single-case) designs, the role of theory, effectiveness research, reticulated interaction between applied and basic research, and the role of process research.

Assessment: I have worked on new measures of experiential avoidance, values, and cognitive fusion in various specific areas and how to develop assessment methods with a view toward functional impact. I believe that traditional psychometrics needs major modification, and that treatment utility should be the key method of determining the value of assessment.

Basic psychology: I have worked to develop and test a comprehensive, experimentally-based functional contextual analysis of the nature of the human language and cognition: Relational Frame Theory (RFT)

Psychopathology: I have explored the role of experiential avoidance, cognitive fusion, loss of contact with the moment, lack of values clarity, rule-based psychological inflexibility and similar processes in the creation of human suffering.

Clinical application: I have worked to develop and test a functional contextual approach to human problems, Acceptance and Commitment Therapy (ACT) and to expand its approach to process and theory into process-based therapy more generally.

Non-clinical applications: I have worked to apply RFT to such areas as education or social bias, to create intervention technologies based on ACT for problems such as stigma and prejudice, and to social extend these ideas through application of evolutionary principles drawn from the work of Elinor Ostrom (see www.prosocial.world)

My interests are not defined particularly by population or problem. I have done work in the last several years with anxiety, depression, psychosis, prejudice, burnout, stress, diabetes, weight control, sleeping, smoking, pain, and substance abuse, among other areas.
